Section 2: Marking your Work under a Creative Commons License

I understand that marking my/our work with a Creative Commons license is voluntary and that my decision of whether to do so will not have any impact on my grade in the related course.

- By marking your work with one of the Creative Commons licenses listed below, you are granting some rights in advance to the public to use your work so that they do not need to contact you to obtain your permission to use your work in certain ways. You are not losing your copyright as an author/creator.
- While your work will be published for the purpose of increasing the breadth and depth of open educational resources available to all, Creative Commons licenses may permit users to use your work for non-educational purposes.

If you agree to mark your work with one of the Creative Commons licenses listed below, please initial beside the specific license you select. Please note that all authors must agree on which license to select, and initial this option.

I release my work under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 license. This means that I retain the copyright, but that others may freely copy, distribute, display, perform, and modify my work, even commercially, as long as they give me credit the way I request, but not in a way that suggests I endorse them or their use. If they want to use my work without giving me credit or for endorsement purposes, they must obtain my permission first.
